

APOCALYPSE NEWSLETTER (1/12/2022)

Apocalypses are a strange thought to me because I always think that there's no way they could happen in real life... right? If weird green undead came about, the world has more than enough resources to shut them down really quickly, some shooting there, some bombing here, society has never had problems sacrificing the needs of the few for the needs of the many. But there's also another factor that I never take into account when thinking of them. Apocalypses can only really happen when we as a society dismiss the problem, to continue living our luxury lives, like we did with covid, like we did with Yoni rambling about chess scores at the lunch table, and that's also what we would do if there were weird green things going around. We would dismiss the problem until your cat is a green blob and you can't take aesthetic pictures with it anymore, just like we dismiss the business for 2-7 short minutes when the katav brings forth the newsletter. You thought this newsletter was about apocalypses, well I would argue, it's called this, because this newsletter IS the apocalypse-shit I think I feel something strange happeni-

Apocalypse. What is the apocalypse? Imagine this; you wake up at 10 in the morning on a Saturday. You have to go to a tech rehearsal for homestead one acts on January 13,14, and 15th. 7:30 tickets for 5 dollars. You go to school at 12. Utter chaos. Ms Lloyd is becoming frustrated. Everything stops. Ms Lloyd is threatening to leave. She doesn't leave. That's the apocalypse...

How a Piece of Chocolate Led to the World's Destruction!!!

A homeless man stole chocolate from a grocery store. The manager of the grocery store then murdered the homeless man. The manager was sentenced to be hanged. The hangman was sick that day, so no hanging took place. Because of this, the hangman lost his job and posted a video about how the government needed to go down. He was promptly hanged, and wave of nationwide protests began. The protestors took up arms and occupied different parts of the country. The regime carelessly massacred them until America started aiding the protestors. An American plane crashed into a nuclear reactor.

One Man's Apocalypse...

Dan Appleman

Humankind has always been fascinated by “end of the world” stories. What is the appeal? Do we actually enjoy thinking about how things fall apart? Perhaps. But in many cases, one man's apocalypse, is another person's fresh start. Alien invasions that destroy humanity mean good times for the aliens. Mad Max didn't have to worry about traffic jams on his Fury Road (though road rage certainly was an issue). Endless Covid variants means big profits for Pfizer and Moderna.

Apocalyptic fiction is not just about destruction – it is about disruption. A change to the status quo. The COVID pandemic has and continues to drive massive disruption. Remote work and remote education have improved the lives of many employees and created new opportunities for students. It is driving massive investment in virtual reality technologies that will have a long-term impact on society. It has resulted in higher pay and new opportunities for many low wage employees.

Living through disruptive times is not easy. It is hard to plan for the future. It is stressful and anxiety provoking. Finding strategies to accept and thrive during times of great change is incredibly challenging. Just remember, disruption is neither bad nor good in and of itself – it's disruption. Part of facing it is to remember to seek out the good parts. Unless of course it's an alien invasion that destroys humanity. That would just suck.

The Mysterious Song of the apocalypse

By acclaimed Lute player Nir Reiter

Australian wildfires in the news
People shooting guns at Jews
Overburdened hospitals
Can ships block trade routes with their hull?
All the money in rich lands
Lack the faith in doctors' hands
Years of rapid arctic thaw
Politics is frozen raw
Students never had their year, rampant cries of raising fear
Everyone has screaming lips, this is the apocalypse
